Chapter XIV Sunday passed uneventfully, and on Monday morning at 4.15 we were off after de Wet, little knowing the dance he was going to lead us. For the next seven days we were to have continual fighting, and the longest marches and roughest fare we had ever had, or were going to have, while I was with Lord Methuen's column. Every man and horse on both sides was to be strained to the utmost, for it was Methuen's great dash after the celebrated leader, and one of the most determined and skilful drives of the war, unhonoured and unsung though it has been. Ninety odd miles were covered by the mounted men and guns in three days. Night and day the Boers fled across the veldt, leaving waggons, stores, ammunition, and prisoners behind them, and night and day the small column (for we were numerically inferior, though we had more guns) clung desperately to their rear. Methuen's task, so we heard afterwards, was to follow de Wet as closely as possible, and drive him towards the Magaliesburg range. Broadwood and Kitchener were supposed to be somewhere near, but we never saw them, and throughout our seven days chase we were the only British force with which he had to deal. Unless de Wet could get through our old friend Oliphant's Nek, he was a gone coon, for Methuen himself would make for and secure the Magato Pass, close...
