The truth is, that, when a fact is once hinted, many just inferences may be drawn, and plausible things advanced concerning it, by those who never were, otherwise, capable of finding it out. The discovery of another continent was, for many years, regarded by the wise and learned men in Europe as a romantic enterprize; but ever since its existence was ascertained by Columbus, the most ignorant mariner can find the new world. The celebrated navigator himself Was not without some hints, from certain strange phenomena seen upon the shores of the western islands, previously to his undertaking the grand expedition. The belief of some superior being has been iit the world ever since there were men in it; all that is left for them is, to try what can be...
